This reference discloses a procedure for testing of tobacco side ends of cigarettes which entails irradiating areas with structured light. A detector receives the reflected light and produces an image corresponding to one of these areas. After evaluation of this image and recognition of a non-regular cigarette, a rejection signal is generated. The irradiated areas are each constructed surface area-dependent and each image is evaluated on the basis of different criteria such as minimum or maximum diameter of an image, the elongation of an image or compactness.
